useful to civilized man as is the date pulsa to the wild Arab, or the cocoanut tree to the gentie heatien of the Polynesia. If a man found his pipe clouged up, he pircked a hair-pin from the nearest woman and raq it through the pipu-stem. If he needed a bitton hook, the hair-pin was an efficient substitute. Shipwwocket people cast on desert illands made wish-hooks out of hair-pins, and as provided themselves with food, and prisoners visited in their cuits by femalo accomplices, made wire ropes by twisting together a few dozen harrpins, and so let themselves down from left windows and made their scape. The uses of the hair-pin could hardly be enumerated in the succe of a newspaper column, and there the hair-pin could hardy to concommand the space of a newspaper column, and there are few men who will not agree with Sir Isaac Newton that the beneficence of nature is concusively shown by her gift to man of the processes of an entirely new spaces of The discovery of an entirely new species of lair pin was made by the elder Mr. Darwin, not quite three years ago. His attention was one day attracted by a hair-pin; of unfamiliar appearance which he found entanged with of naturalists; and knowing that hairbeen developed by the process of ha turns aslection I rou the other and better known specien. His views have been generally adopted,
